Scandinavian ergonomic solutions

A historical focus on accidents in the workplace

Official statistics recording accidents at work have existed in Sweden since 1906. This early focus on occupational accidents and injuries has effectively given Sweden a “head start”.

Focus on solutions

The direct communication, with minimum government involvement, has meant that new innovation and ideas can spread quickly and problems are resolved more immediately, leading in turn, to a broad policy of ergonomics in the workplace.

Very low historical unemployment figures

The full employment policy of the Government up until the late part of the 20th century resulted in very low unemployment figures. In the early 1970's unemployment was as low as 1%. This meant that employers needed to offer outstanding working conditions to encourage people to work for them, with safer and healthier environments.

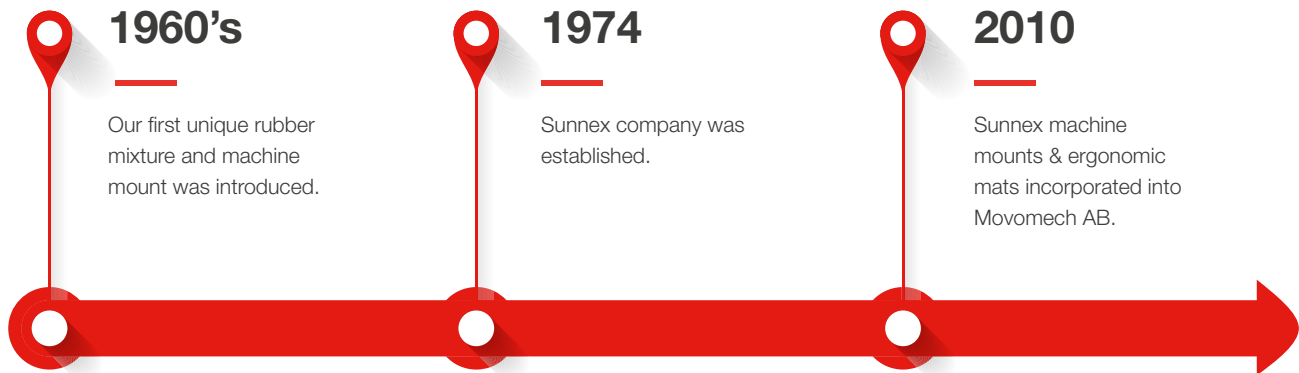

Legislation

During the 1970's new labour reforms was adopted by the Swedish parliament, including the Work Environment Act of 1977. The law gave people more say in their working conditions, considering issues such as stress, monotony and work systems as valid areas for concern.

An elevated level of R&D

In research conducted by the European Commission, Sweden was ranked as the leading country amongst the EU for innovation. The comparatively high labour costs of Sweden have forced companies to invest in new innovative products that demand high quality rather than engaging in mass-producing manufacturing.
